INTRODUCTION

ABOUT

For me, architecture begins with people and place.

I see every project as a conversation between the people who will use a space, the character of its site, and the possibilities of material and light. Good architecture, I believe, does not need to shout; it quietly supports everyday life and is built to last.

I work across scales, from the detail of a joint to the shape of a neighbourhood, moving between sketches, drawings and models to test ideas. Research and close observation of context are part of how I design, not separate from it.

I value buildings that are honest in their construction, responsive to climate and culture, and open to change over time. This portfolio presents a selection of projects that reflect this way of thinking.
